The Tim Blys

"Dead Horse Town"

The Tim Blys churn out a grunge-y three chord monte of mid-80s punk fracas. The trio emerged from the corn-ridden landscape of Mattoon, IL in 2012 to break up the monotony of working in a grocery store and get the best of a boss that provided the band's name. There is indeed a Tim Bly.

The trio combined their propensity for chronic overthinking and piles of punk seven inches in paper sleeves to create a raw and pensive breed of basement punk rock. They added their own hallmark through Nordic/baritone vocals and insightful/vitriol lyrics.

Matt Davis mashes out chords on the guitar and provides the Nordic/baritone vocals, which he shares with bassist/heartthrob Joey Wheeler. Greg "Poopstains" Coffey pounds the drums and occasionally bleeds profusely. The nickname is apropos for the drummer of a band whose set contains both Saturday morning cartoon themes and songs about a friend's suicide.

About This Record:

Three years in the making, the record encapsulates the corn-induced frustrations of a central Illinois trio of punk rockers who watched far too many cartoons in their youth. The record contains the raw enthusiasm of punk with the overwrought alt rock on the threshold of adulthood. The 7" will strike a chord with fans of The Replacements, Lookout! bands, and the Alkaline Trio family.

Selected Press:

"What started as a way for three friends to irritate their manager has evolved over 4 years into one of Coles County's mainstay bands. When they began, the trio connected over cartoons they enjoyed and musical influences - Alkaline Trio being a key influence. On a lark, they practiced performing cartoon theme songs, Adventure Time being the first. Their whimsical, speeded-up versions have become something of a signature for the Blys since then."
